North Korea Fires 2 Cruise Missiles Ahead Of Military Drills Between US-Seoul

- North Korea fired two cruise missiles in the wee hours of Wednesday, citing the Seoul Defense Ministry officials. The launch came right before a speech by South Korean President Yoon Suk Yeol to mark his 100th day in office, during which he underlined to provide North Korea with aid, if it agreed to end nuclear weapons development.
- Cruise missiles, unlike ballistic missiles, stay closer to the ground, making them harder to detect as they are propelled by jet engines.
- North Korea has had a flurry of recent missile tests, with Wednesday's marking the 18th launch this year.
- North Korea has always dodged US requests for denuclearization talks sent through third parties and Pyongyang appears to show no interest in returning to the negotiating table.
- The last missile launch took place on June 5 with eight short-range ballistic missiles which South Korea and the US responded to by firing eight more missiles into waters off the east coast of the Korean Peninsula.
